In mid-1945, a team of US soldiers liberated a Japanese internment camp in East China, freeing more than 2,000 foreign civilians.

A young Chinese scholar was also a member of the rescue party, and 70 years later, he’s still feted by those he helped to save.

“Objects aren’t important,” he said. “It’s enough to know I helped to save my life. When I jumped from an airplane until that piece of parachute silk embroidered and lower, and then circle again. I was swept off my feet by the pandemonium.”

“Would the Japanese in the out­stretched hands of the camp have mer­ited the help they got at the last moment?”

“We were under no orders to go to the camp. We were just there as a show of the American presence.”

The Japanese military decided to use the camp to house internees from other places. For the rescuers it was a life­saving operation.

By early 1945, the Japanese were preparing to evacuate the camp en masse. At this time, the Japanese were very dependent on the camp for housing internees from other places.

In mid­1945, a team of US soldiers liberated a Japanese internment camp in East China, freeing more than 2,000 foreign civilians.

A young Chinese scholar was also a member of the rescue party, and 70 years later, he’s still feted by those he helped to save.

“Objects aren’t important,” he said. “It’s enough to know I helped to save my life. When I jumped from an airplane until that piece of parachute silk embroidered and lower, and then circle again. I was swept off my feet by the pandemonium.”

“Would the Japanese in the out­stretched hands of the camp have mer­ited the help they got at the last moment?”

“We were under no orders to go to the camp. We were just there as a show of the American presence.”

The Japanese military decided to use the camp to house internees from other places. For the rescuers it was a life­saving operation.

By early 1945, the Japanese were preparing to evacuate the camp en masse. At this time, the Japanese were very dependent on the camp for housing internees from other places.