The situation in China in 1947 was mainly reflected in War of Liberation. The strategic turning point was the Kuomintang army's Strategic Offensive Phase. They launched multiple battles in succession, and the Communist Party of China passed military reform. Gradually, they gained the initiative on the battlefield. ¹

Military situation

In 1947, the Kuomintang army in Shandong launched a large-scale offensive. The East China Field Army adopted mobile warfare and attrition tactics. In the Battle of Laiwu and the Battle of Menglianggu, there was continuous annihilation of the Kuomintang 74th Reorganized Division. They waited for elite troops to thwart their key offensive plan. ¹

Strategic Turnaround

During this period, the Chinese Communist Party strengthened its command system through military reforms. Liu and Deng's army advanced in the Dabie Mountains, opening up a base area. The situation gradually shifted from defense to localized counter-offensives. In August 1947, the Central Military Commission of the Communist Party of China released a "Military training program" to promote the modernization of the armed forces and lay the foundation for subsequent strategic decisive battles. ¹
